Semiotics: Signs of the Times is Brill's new series devoted to the study of semiotics across disciplines. This book series starts from the general idea of semiotic signs, divided into icons, indexes, and symbols. Semiotics gives meaning to signs, sign functions, and sign processes. It is also concerned with sign-users (senders and receivers) and how signs are transmitted from one organism to another. To give meaning happens in everyday experience as well as experimentation. Semiotics seeks to discover how the signs of language, gestures, visual images, music, dance, theater, as well as medical and psychological symptoms, architecture, and political theory embark with a theory of signs to give belief, values, and techniques which serve for theoretical foundations and interdisciplinary method in sciences and humanities.

Semiotics: Signs of the Times invites contributions on the newest trend of cultural research in linguistics, literature, fine arts, philosophy, biology, anthropology, folklore, technology, and other fields. The series is open to new synthesis of techniques of research, experiences, memories, and myth with new meanings.

Proposals for single-authored monographs and edited volumes are equally welcome.

Welcome to Brill's Literature and Cultural Studies

Literature and Cultural Studies at Brill are central to our mission of publishing superior scholarship that addresses the complex needs and struggles of the ever-changing cultural landscape of a globalized world.

Anchored in well-established critical and comparative publications, this portfolio experiences dynamic expansion and diversification following these core principles:

Social responsiveness: titles like Dutch Racism or a series like Studia Imagologica uncover the legacy of racism or national stereotypes in cultural discourse.

Interdisciplinarity: we pioneered with series like Studies in Intermediality, Environmental studies, Translation Studies, Critical Studies, Word and Image Studies, and recently added Narratives & Mental Health, which in turn responds socially to the increase in need for mental healthcare.

Global perspectives: in our review and selection process we stimulate interaction between different schools of thought, by means of diverse editorial boards, but also in our authorship when we commission new projects. For instance, the Cultural Histories of the Avant-Garde - decentralizes the study of the avant-garde, and our Handbooks in Memory Studies combines Area Studies with Memory Studies, bringing in authors and editors from the regions being studied.

We believe these are the key factors to truly understand and learn from each other's cultural expressions and sustainably serve the academic community.

We publish in English, French, Spanish and German.

To keep updated on our new publications, strategic plans, and conference visits, you can subscribe to the bimonthly Literature and Cultural Studies Newsletter.
